Diagnosis and procedure codes track the spread of disease or the effectiveness of a particular procedure. However, in the United States, their main use is in the reimbursement process. Medical coding and medical billers help us bill accurately and efficiently.

In healthcare, there are three parties involved in the billing process: the patient, the healthcare provider, and the insurance provider. It is the medical biller's job to link these three parties together and negotiate and/or arrange the correct payment between the parties.

The medical biller collects all of the information about the patient and the patient's procedure and compiles that information into one bill for the insurance company.

This bill - commonly called a claim - contains a patient's demographic information, medical history, and insurance coverage, plus a report on what procedures were performed and why.
